France builds floats in Brest and Marseilles, Germany builds an army in Berlin, and Turkey builds a fleet in Smyrna.

MUNICH (1 January 1906): Following an all-night New Year's Eve party at the Imperial Palace, Kaiser Max III announced that rumors of Germany's impending defeat were totally false. "As a matter of fact," he told an American reporter, "we have recruited a new army in Berlin."

"Ya, und yet happened to dem two fleets!" shouted Prince Friedrich from a chandelier.

The Kaiser ignored the question. "Dese new army is recruited from among patriotic citizens who want to chase der English und Russians out. It includes fifteen-year-old boys, veterans of der Franco-Russian war, a picked squad of juvenile delinquents led by my stepsons - who are in every way fitted for der task - remnants of der fleets who escaped when we scuttled dem, und der royal bodyguard of - mine dear friend, der King of der Spanish Islands."

"Do you expect them to be effective against the Russians?" the Kaiser was asked.

"I don't know if dey scare der enemy," he replied, "but dey certainly scares me!"

The French army in Tyrolia is annihilated.

STRASSBURG (16 June 1906): The Imperial Court of the 25th Reich, temporarily removed to Strassburg, today issued an explanation of the orders given to the two remaining German armies.

"Vy didt der First Army come to France, while der Last Chance Division went to Prussia?" the Kaiser replied. "Simple! Die soldiers of der two armies cannot attend each other. Und more to der point, I can't stand elder of dem."

Max III paused to hold 86 kings in a pinochle game with the Prime Minister, and continued, "Still, dere iss von bright side. My stepsons, Princes Johann und Friedrich, are mit der Last Chance Division. Somewhere in Prussia by now."

At that minute a huge firecracker exploded under the pinochle table, scattering the Kaiser's cards in all directions. "There they go, Your Majesty!" shouted Prince Rudolf von Rhabarber as the Kaiser's stepsons disappeared down a corridor.
